James Donovan returned to Miami from Havana and said he was still hopeful that 1,113 Cuban prisoners will be released after he and Cuban Premier Castro work out further details. Donovan, a New York lawyer, has been negotiating for the release of the prisoners, captured in the 1961 invasion. He said yesterday he has offered food and medicine in exchange for the prisoners, but no cash.

The International Longshoremen's Association, which already claims to have turned away one ship from New York Harbor this week in its campaign against shipping lines doing business with Cuba, has its "eyes on three more coming in," a union official said. He stated the ship the longshoremen refused to load was an American-built vessel bringing cargo from Rumania to Cuba and that it was trying to pick up a load of scrap metal in New York bound for Italy.
